Tell us a joke

How do you know if you're in bed with an elephant?
Because of the 'E' on his pyjamas.

Once upon a time, when we were working as a waitress in a cocktail bar (alright, a waiter in a café) we happened across a Raquel Welch wig catalogue that has since kept us entertained for years. Don't ask us why it was there, or why someone would leave something so brilliant behind, just embrace the wonder of Welch's wigs, which "bring you her signature beauty, style and comfort".

Our favourites are probably Feline, Lavish and Luscious (although if we're honest, Feline just looks like Lavish with the fringe going the other way).

I shall name that tune in one

£59.99
amazon.co.uk

The iNo is a large plastic ball that you slot your iPod into, magically transforming it into a Name That Tune-style party game (with buzzers and everything!)
Ridiculously addictive – and of course you get the upper hand if it's your iPod in the dock – and easily won if you have, like us, the most ridiculous playlists ever.
Plus it comes in black, white and pink. Sold, to the poof writing the Stuff page.

X marks the spot

£25.50
all good pharmacies

Something of a revolution in the US, the Blemish Complex Kit sold over two million units. And little wonder, as it can deliver a clear complexion in up to five weeks.
It's aimed at people that suffer from, or have suffered from, acne but it also "draws out impurities by a gentle process of rehydration". All we're saying is that if excess boozing has left you a little bit red...

Beautiful robot dancing alone

amazon.co.uk

We never had toys like this when we were kids. Not that we made do with a stick and a hoop (no, that's not a euphemism either) but this is actually scary.

It's the world's smallest mass produced bipedal humanoid robot.

Via remote control (or voice control, if you speak with a vague American accent) he'll do all kinds of dancing and kung-fu. He also has 200 phrases (including all the lines from Abigail's Party. Probably.)

It's yet to master a Steps dance routine, which is the deciding factor in all our social interaction frankly.

That really gets my goat
Oxlam.co.uk

Apparently it wasn't practical to get an actual goat sent in to the office, despite the fact we thought it would be absolutely hilarious. We know there are all kinds of ethical reasons why giving a goat as a gift is a good thing, but if you actually had the goat to hand you'd at least have milk or, worst case scenario, a ruddy good fry-up. Still, we're not giving up on the idea of our reality sitcom A Gay and His Goat just yet.

Power nap
From £30,000
lomme.com

Slumber in style with the ultra modern, uber stylish, Lomme (Light Over Matter Mind Evolution) bed. Described as "a piece of furniture, a work of art and the most relaxing, protected and natural place to restore energy levels." The organically shaped bed includes light therapy, an in-built massage system and soothing bedtime sounds for the best sleep (and hangover remedy?) ever.
